

If you're thinking about ordering communication access tags for your organisation, it's important to decide which symbols to include.

AAA provides a vast collection of symbols in their library suite and offers the ability to customise symbols as well.

To determine which symbols to choose, it's best to choose ones that represent your organisation's products and services.

While this may seem like a daunting task, focus on the types of information visitors, staff and clients are most likely to seek.

Symbol Selection

Identify Specific Needs: Understand the communication requirements of your organisation. Determine if the tags will primarily aid in initial interactions with visitors, facilitate communication between staff members or serve another purpose.

Customisation Options: Opt for tags that align with your organisation's branding and specific communication needs. This could include adding logos and/or additional text to the tags.

Versatility: Choose tags that can be used in various settings and situations within your organisation. Versatile tags can adapt to different communication needs and environments, ensuring they remain useful in a variety of scenarios.

Training and Support: Ensure staff are adequately trained and supported for implementing and using the communication access tags effectively. This may include AAA's online Communication Access and Awareness training, other training materials, resources and ongoing assistance as needed.

By considering these factors and conducting thorough research, you can choose communication access tags that are well-suited to the needs of your organisation and effectively facilitate communication among staff members and visitors alike.
